CHAPTER X

It was a fine day, and the sun shone brightly on the water. The ship was moving steadily on its way, and the crew were all busy with their duties. The captain, a man of a stern and weathered face, looked out over the sea with a thoughtful expression. The wind was fresh from the north, and the waves were white with foam. The ship's sails were full, and she moved with a graceful and powerful motion. The crew members were seen at their posts, some looking towards the horizon, others engaged in conversation. The air was filled with the sounds of the ship's machinery and the voices of the crew. The scene was one of activity and purpose, as the ship sailed on its journey across the open sea.
