HIDDEN TERROR

CHAPTER IX.

It was a dark, stormy night, and the wind howled through the trees. The moon was hidden behind heavy clouds, and the only light came from the flickering fire in the hearth. A man in a dark coat and hat stood by the window, looking out into the night with a look of intense concern.

"What is it, John?" asked a woman's voice from the doorway.

"Nothing, my dear," he replied, turning back. "I was just thinking of the weather. It's a terrible night for a walk."

The woman looked at him for a moment, then turned and went back into the room. The man remained by the window, his mind racing with thoughts of the events that had transpired in the days since he had returned home.

He remembered the strange man who had come to the door, the way he had looked at him, and the way he had disappeared into the night. He had never seen him before, and he had never heard of him since. It was as if he had been a ghost, appearing for a moment and then vanishing without a trace.

The man shivered as he thought of the man's face, the way his eyes had seemed to pierce through his coat and hat, and the way he had seemed to know exactly what he was thinking. It was a terrifying experience, and he had never been able to shake the feeling that he had been watched.

He turned away from the window and looked at the fire in the hearth. The flames were bright and warm, but they did not seem to bring him any comfort. He felt as if he was still being watched, as if the man was still out there somewhere, waiting for him to come back.

The door opened, and the woman came in. She looked at him with a look of concern.

"What is it, John?" she asked.

"Nothing, my dear," he replied. "I was just thinking of the weather. It's a terrible night for a walk."
