The farmers of the great Mississippi Valley who receive living wages will buy more of the products of the factories of the fast. That will make a demand for manufactured goods. That will increase the opportunities for labor and tend-to-increase the wages. The greatest amount of business is not done on low prices, but on reasonable prices. The American farmer cannot grow wheat or corn of pork or wool for lower prices than those which he now obtains. If the farmer cannot live as an American ought to live, then neither the business man nor the laborer in the cities—can prosper. The Boston he cities can prosper. The Boston Ierald is engaged in the small business of seeking to array the workingmen of the East, as consumers, against the producers of the West. It is small business, It will react.
