THE WORST EVER KNOWN
WIND, RAIN AND HAIL

That Was the Kind of Storm That Played Havoc Over a Large Scope of Country on Saturday Night

Saturday evening, June 18, will go down in local history as the date on which Wayne was visited by one of the most destructive hail storms, accompanied by wind and rain, that this part of the state has ever known. The storm originated in the early evening about six miles southeast of old LaPorte and traveled in a westerly, northwesterly direction for about ten miles, the hail portion of it being nearly eight miles long and about five miles wide, Wayne being nearly in the center of the storm in all directions. In all of this scope of country the crops were stripped and beaten into the ground until they are almost a total loss, especially oats, tame grass and alfalfa, while the wild grass in the lowlands was very much damaged by the overflow of muddy water. Corn was also driven into the ground, but being still very small, the general opinion is that it will soon come forward again. Potatoes were also badly injured, being stripped of all the leaves, nothing but the bare stalks remaining. It is thought they will also leaf out again, but some of the earlier varieties are so far advanced that it is doubtful if they do. Oats gave promise of an abundant crop and it may be they will rally some from the beating they received but most of them were too far along to do so. In the path of the hail storm rabbits, jackrabbits, birds and other animals were killed by the hail, while a number of farmers lost calves and other stock by the high water. Here in Wayne, and all through the country affected, for that matter, it seemed very much like a cloudburst, the water falling in torrents for nearly two hours, and the hail for an hour and a quarter incessantly. The most of the hail were about the size of the end of one's finger, but many of them were as large as a hickory-nut and some of them even larger. The hail was piled up in the yards in town so deeply that in many places they were not all melted until Sunday afternoon although the night was warm and the sun Sunday was very hot. In Wayne all of the gardens were entirely destroyed, every kind of vegetable being entirely divested of leaves or driven into the ground until you could hardly tell where some of the plants were, while the shade and fruit trees were divested of nearly one-half of their leaves and the ground so fully covered that they were washed up almost in windrows on all the lawns. Trees were also much damaged by the wind, large limbs being torn off. Window lights were broken in all parts of town and general consternation reigned until about 11:30. With every street a raging flood six inches to a foot deep, with water from curb line to curb line it naturally followed that when they met the converging line on Main street as many of them do, that there would be the mischief to pay, and there was. While the outlets are ample for all ordinary rainfall, they are not sufficient for a time like Saturday night, and the result was that when the floods reached Main street the gutters were soon filled to overflowing with muddy water and the walks along the west side of Main were soon flowing six inches deep while every grated basement opening for light or entrance was a place into which water flowed like a mill race until the basements were full or the storm ceased. Much damage was done in this way, as there was no time to remove anything even had the owners been on the ground when the overflow began. No little damage was also done at some of the homes by water flooding the rooms after the windows were broken. The incessant pounding of the hail for over an hour was the longest period of such a storm ever known here.

NOTES

John Liveringhouse had two calves drowned.
Weber Bros. had fifty-two window lights broken out of the Wayne roller mills.
There were hundreds of window lights broken in the residence part of town.
Furehner & Duerig sustained at least $300 loss by the flooding of the cellar.
The dealers in window glass reaped a great harvest after Saturday night's storm.
There were at least twenty-five large window lights broken out of the high school building.
William Weber lost 150 chickens in the storm; R. Perrin thirty, and lots of people from half a dozen to one dozen each.
The upper story of the First National Bank building suffered more broken window lights than any other business block in the city.
On the old Cutler place, just west of town, the wind did considerable damage, blowing down the wind mill and some buildings and badly wrecking the trees.
Dealers in garden seeds disposed of most of their stock as a result of the storm as every one was anxious to raise a little garden sass. There was also a great demand for tomato and cabbage plants.
Joe Schmalsteig, who was running a clothes cleaning and tailor shop in the basement of the Gaertner & Beckenhauer furniture store, suffered more real loss than any one, as he is a poor man, and it was all he had.
The east part of town suffered a good deal from the high water. It did not run in as swift currents as it did in the southwest portion, but it spread out and covered a good deal of ground and did not drain off readily.
Win. Piepenstock suffered a greater loss than any business firm, by the flooding of the basement under his harness shop. He had $1,000 worth of goods there at the spring invoice most of which was practically ruined.
Water backed up into the clothing store of J. H. Kate and inflicted a loss hard to determine, but estimated at from $500 to $1,000. The cellar became so full that the water was forced up through the floor, soaking into many goods.
The Nebraska telephone company had over 200 phones knocked out of commission in town and its country lines also suffered. In town the lines have been busy and one of their engineers was here Monday locating breaks in the underground cable.
Six miles west of town, while they did not get any hail they got lots of wind of the twister order. Telephone lines were blown down, and R. A. McEachen had his large corn cribs and other buildings blown down, also his windmill, and large trees uprooted.

Frank Shulte, 6 1/2 miles southwest, had the buildings on his farm blown down and wrecked, inflicting several hundred dollars damage. Others in that neighborhood also suffered loss.

Nearly all of the robins and song birds appear to have been either killed by the hail or drowned by the water where they sought shelter. In the editor's neighborhood, where there were dozens of robins before the storm there has only been one since then, and it has been constantly mournfully piping for its mates.

The basement of the new Bressler block filled with water, undermining the front and rear cellar walls to such an extent that they fell in and will have to be rebuilt. The weight of the side walls held them firm. It took almost two days pumping with two gasoline engines to get the water out of that cellar and the Whalen basement adjoining.

Mail carrier Crossland reports that things on route four looked as good as usual Monday, except on the east end, where everything was out to pieces and pounded into the ground. On the north side some corn on the low lands was covered up by the washings from the higher ground, and one large bridge had been lifted from its bearings and turned part way around.

More genuine havoc was wrought in the southwest part of town than in any other. There the sidewalks were torn out and carried away, out buildings lifted off their foundations and floated into their neighbor's yard. The drainage through that part of town comes a good ways and the water rushed down in torrents. The Leo Buroker family suffered more loss than any one in that part of town. Driftwood was the cause of the water backing up into the house to a depth of at least one foot, and the rise was so sudden that there was no time to remove anything. The floors were covered with muddy water and rugs, carpets and furniture were injured.

Nearly Drowned.

Probably the most exciting experience of any in Saturday night's storm was that which befell John Kai, Paul Harrington, C. W. Sausbury and Roy Ley. They had been down to Altona in the afternoon, and on the return trip it began to rain shortly after they left Altona, but, thinking from the appearances it was only going to be a shower, decided to push on. They got along all right until they reached a point a few rods east of the mile corner south of town, when in the darkness and storm the automobile ran off the grade and they were forced to stop. They tried to get the machine back on the grade but the slippery condition of the ground made it impossible. Still thinking that the storm would stop any moment they decided to seek a little shelter from the wind, rain and pounding hail. Kai and Ley crouched down on the north side of the automobile and Sausbury and Harrington found temporary refuge on a stump in the willow hedge on the south side of the road. In a short time they realized that there was another danger impending. The water began to rise and it seemed to come down like a wall two feet high. Harrington left his shelter and attempted to reach the automobile but missed his footing and went under out of sight. He managed to get back on the stump again, and in a few minutes, as the water continued to rise, he and Sausbury made another effort to reach the automobile where the other two were sitting on the seats. Although they both got in deep water and went in all over they got on the grade and reached the machine. After joining forces and holding a consultation it was decided to make an effort to get out of there. Guided by the flashes of lightning and sticking close together they managed to keep on the grade although the water was fully waist high and running with the force of a mill race, and had they been swept off their feet it meant death. When they reached the bridge they realized it as a point of safety, and were soon under cover, having been in the wind-driven rain and hail for fully an hour. Aside from being nearly exhausted and well bruised by hail they escaped serious injury but it was an experience that none of them will soon forget and have no desire to repeat.

PURE LIME WATER
As lime water is mostly used for babies too much care cannot be taken in its preparation.
Ordinary builders' lime and city water are not good enough according to our idea.
We use pure lime and distilled water in making our lime water. Made fresh each week. A purer article cannot be produced. It costs no more than other lime water.
