

Social Institute Is Held At Normal

Dr. Howard C. Hill of the University of Chicago, is the Chief Speaker at Sessions.

Following music by the school orchestra, led by Prof. W. C. Hunter, Dr. Howard C. Hill, head of the department of social studies of the University of Chicago, addressed the opening session of the Social Science Institute held under the direction of Prof. J. G. W. Lewis, Dean H. H. Hahn, Prof. O. B. Roberts and Prof. E. E. Melvin at the State Teachers College Friday afternoon, his subject being "Citizenship or Subjectship?" Besides the students, many from town heard and appreciated the address.

The Hill did not try to define citizenship which is nothing, but self-direction. Citizenship is more abstract, and he tested his audience to show differences of opinion as to the three greatest American citizens, in suggesting Washington and Lincoln, he found much agreement. A few responded to his suggestion of Ben Franklin as the third. He explained the achievements of Franklin to show why he belongs in the group of three.

The speaker showed that service to the public determines qualities of citizenship. He suggested the multiple horrors of possible future wars, and that people ought to be educated and refined to prevent war. He emphasized the need of heart and hand—instruction, inspiration and participation. As pointed out by speaker, it is not enough to think along right lines—it is important to act accordingly.

Importance of English. Dr. Hill gave an address Friday evening on "English and Cooperation, Both or Neither." He stated that young folks should be taught, in every classroom, citizenship, good habits and good English. The three can and should be given students by every teacher in connection with every subject. Citizenship and good habits are just as essential and just as easily taught on the athletic field and playground as in the civics and English classrooms.

Good English is essential in every classroom, stated Dr. Hill. Citizens should be well trained in English in order that they may understand and express themselves. Dr. Hill divided English into literature and technical grammar. Literature is very important in inspiring young folks and in teaching them correct usages. The technical side was, however, stressed more by Dr. Hill.

In the technical grammar one has oral and written work. Students should be well instructed in the former in order that they may interpret what others say, and also in order that they may express themselves intelligently.

Dr. Hill spoke of written work more in detail, stating that for best results a student must have an "inner urge" and an "outer audience." The teacher, in this connection, has an opportunity to develop in each student a desire for individual expression. The social significance is realized when he thinks of an outer audience to whom he is writing. The speaker then, words? She should have enthusiasm, and in this connection Dr. Hill stated that enthusiasm will lead to success anywhere. The student mentioned that the teacher should be well informed on subject matter, should dress well, have good habits and use good English.

Methods of Teaching. Dr. Hill addressed students and instructors of northeast Nebraska Saturday morning on "Mastery Procedure in the Social Sciences" and "Organization of Material." He used the teaching of history as an example but stated that the methods can be applied to any subject. He pointed out the five steps in the process as investigation, presentation, assimilation, organization and recitation.

In dealing with a class Dr. Hill stated that he first investigated the fund of knowledge on a certain subject—this was to prevent teaching something students already knew. He then presented a bird's-eye view of the subject and tested the pupils of what they had been told, repeating the subject matter for those who did not understand it the first time.

The next step was presenting. He gave pupils books and other reference material in order that they might work out the units of the subject and tested the pupils of the students prepare an outline of the material they had acquired, drawing up a logical grouping of the facts.

Throughout the aid of books. The recitation closed the work. This he made not simply as a means of testing the students' knowledge of facts but as a period in which the pupils expressed themselves. Only when they understand subject matter thoroughly, stated Dr. Hill, can they give good explanations of the topic.

Former Student Is Married On Easter

Miss Vivian L. Serven, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. N. O. Serven of Concord, and Mr. Hubert H. Winters were married Easter at 6 o'clock in the evening at the W. A. Canaday home in Bridgeport, Neb. Rev. F. M. Sturdevant of the First Baptist church performing the ceremony. Dinner was served afterwards at the Silver Grill cafe.

Mrs. Canaday played the wedding march and the bridal couple unattended, took their places at the altar. Miss Serven wore grey crepe de chine.

The bride attended the Wayne State Teachers College three years and has been teaching two years, the past year in the Nolte school near Broadwater.

Mr. and Mrs. Winters will live on a farm eight miles south of Broadwater.

Comedy of War-Time France At Crystal

Virile, vigorous, human and typical of a phase of American life, is "Behind the Front," Taramunc's great comedy of the "A-E-I-O," in France, to be shown at the Crystal on Friday and Saturday, April 23 and 24.

With Wallace Beery, Raymond Hatton and Mary Brian in the featured roles, Director Edward Sutherland, fresh from his triumph, because of having directed Raymond Griffith in "A Eaguilar Fellow," has made "Behind the Front" a classic of sardonic humor, and a remarkable contribution to the portraits of life during the great war.

"Behind the Front" is a riot of laughter yet it is sympathetic humor, for it is laughter with the doughboys, during their trials and tribulations, and not at them. It appeals to mother tenderness, to the romantic of a sweetheart, as exemplified by beautiful Mary Brian, as well as to co-doughboys themselves, in whom it will arouse reminiscent chuckles, as Wallace Beery and Raymond Hatton, a couple of dumb doughboys who are "badges," appear in scenes and situations familiar to every man in the army. Chester Conklin, Richard Arlen, Louise Lorraine and

Wayne Resident Is Found Dead In Home

Funeral service was conducted Friday afternoon at the Beckenbauer chapel for Peter Wagner who was found dead Thursday morning at his home in the southwest part of town. Rev. Fenton C. Jones of the Presbyterian church, was in charge and interment was made in Greenwood cemetery.

Mr. Wagner lived alone in a small one-room house south and west of the Seavidge show grounds. He spent a great deal of his time reading in the Marcus Kroger office. The last time Mr. Kroger had seen him was the previous Saturday but as he was told Mr. Wagner planned to visit his daughter, Mrs. Minnie Ulrich in the country, he thought Mr. Wagner had gone there. Mr. Kroger tried to call Mrs. Ulrich several times the first of the week but was unable to reach her by telephone until Thursday morning. When he found that Mr. Wagner had not been in the country Mr. Kroger started for the home to see what had happened. He and W. Bonawitz went to the house. The door was open and Mr. Wagner was lying lifeless on the floor between the stove and bed. William Beckenhauer and F. S. Berry were called. The former stated that Mr. Wagner had been dead between twenty-four and forty-eight hours. It is thought that Mr. Wagner, who suffered with heart trouble, had possibly Tuesday night, gotten up from his bed, opened the door and then suffered a heart attack from which he died. Neighbors had not seen him since Tuesday.

Mr. Wagner had been working in the C. H. Fisher lumber yard until last summer when he was obliged to stop all kinds of heavy work because of heart trouble. He had previously been shoveling coal for Mr. Kroger.

Deceased was aged 69 years, 4 months and 19 days. He was born in Germany Nov. 27, 1856, he married Miss Amanda Muth and to this union eight children were born, one dying in infancy and one daughter, Mrs. Jerry Jones, dying five years ago. Mrs. Wagner passed away sixteen years ago. The family came to Wayne about twenty-five years ago. About ten years ago Mr. Wagner went to South Dakota and remained a while, coming back to Wayne in about 1921.

Mr. Wagner leaves the following daughters and sons: Mrs. C. Murphy of near Wayne, John Wagner of Verdel, Mrs. Minnie Ulrich of near Wayne, Mrs. Elsie Walker of Creighton, Mrs. Lillie Humphrey of Whiting, Iowa, and Henry Wagner of Bloomfield. The two sons were the deceased from some of way for the funeral service.

Roasters may sometimes grow to weigh ten pounds, but Mr. Glaser says it is very seldom that a hen will weigh that much. A ten pound goose is quite a bird, but a hen that weighs that much is surely worthy of mention.

Frank Hitchcock Is Held In High Esteem

—Harrison Herald: "Frank Hitchcock, a man whose name—standing in a message passed from one to another late Monday night. 'It can not be true'—was the answer in every instance. Frank Hitchcock, a man who had seen him and talked with him during the day. But it was all too true: Frank Hitchcock, strong, active, full of life, and full of energy, had fallen down without a second's warning in the very prime of vigorous manhood. Frank Hitchcock, prominent in the community for his every community building project, was no more. For the past few weeks, he had been working early and late, only on preparing for a big sale at his own store, but also on a 'Better Hartington' proposition which was being started by the business men of the city. He had prepared for it by a big advertisement which ran in the papers of the city Wednesday, April 7, and was most enthusiastic about its success.

On Monday he had been busy in the store, and a local doctor who had seen him and talked with him during the day. But it was all too true: Frank Hitchcock, strong, active, full of life, and full of energy, had fallen down without a second's warning in the very prime of vigorous manhood.

When the Hitchcocks entered the house to open some windows, Mr. Hitchcock went to the bath room to prepare for bed, and his wife, more than reached the kitchen when she heard her daughter, Ardith, who was sleeping in a bedroom adjoining the bath room, give a terrible scream and running to the room, she saw her husband lying on the bath room floor. Dr. Dorsey was summoned and arrived in about two minutes. Dr. J. M. Johnson, coming a moment later, but they could do nothing to revive him. He had apparently died instantly from an acute heart attack. He had suffered a few smothering spells at times previous to this, but had paid little attention to them, as they had no effect on his work without complaining and few people realized that he was not in perfect health.

of the late Gideon P. Hitchcock and Mrs. Hitchcock of Wayne, was born at Blair, Oct. 27, 1878. When he was quite young the family moved to Wayne and he grew to manhood there, graduating at the head of his class from the Wayne High school in May, 1897. After his graduation, he went to Omaha where he obtained a position as bookkeeper, which he retained until he went into business for himself. While in that city he met Miss Gertrude LaFarge and they were married at the home of his sister, Mrs. Wilbur, Marshalltown, Iowa, Jan. 1, 1907. He and his bride made their home in Omaha until March 23, 1911, when they came to Hartington, and they established the Waykup Variety store, a business which has since been enlarged to embrace a general merchandise stock.

The late Mr. Hitchcock was a good business man, progressive, honest and far-sighted, and with the assistance of his loyal wife, he had built up a thriving business in the country, and beautiful floral offerings filled the room where the body lay. The house was thronged by friends and neighbors, offering sympathy to the sorrowing wife and little ones.

Rock Island Corn Planters

Both the Rock Island No. 555 "Cadet" and No. 444 Four-Wheel are accurate, strong, but simply constructed, "Full Hill Drop" planters. They are equipped with round hole machine-reamed-to-size plates, insuring the required number of kernels to the hill. The valves are perfectly timed. The hills cannot be mixed—the double valves prevent it, because one valve is always closed tight when the other is wide open—the possibility of entangling and holding some of the kernels destined for the hill.

The lower valve is right down in the furrow, closer than on the ordinary planter and is protected by the rear of the runner opener, so that the kernels are dropped in a bunch. This prevents bouncing or scattering of kernels. When properly set you get a perfect cross-cultivate. This means straight rows, which are easy to cross-cultivate. Many hills of corn are saved because of the ease of cultivating on account of the straight check.

Threshermen That Save All the Grain

Full Hyatt Roller Bearings, Alemite-Zerk Lubrication and the Tilting Feeder

The minute the head of a bundle comes from the feeder the Big Cylinder, the Big Cylinder, turns into a big teeth of the cylinder and concave are set by hand, close enough to thresh every kernel out of the head, but not so close as to crack the grain.

At the speed of a mile a minute, the Big Cylinder throws the lying straw and grain to the 2nd thresherman, the Man Behind the Cuts. The grain goes through its grate, is stopped by the check plate and sent direct to the grain pan.

More than 90 percent of the grain is separated right there, and separated forever, in a Nichols & Shepard Thresher.

The 3rd thresherman, the Steel Winged Beater, then takes a whack at the straw, beating it down to the 4th thresherman—the Beating Shaker. That, both beat, beat the straw, till the last kernel of grain is beaten out and saved.

Send to us for complete information as to how the 4 Threshermen will work for any farmer at a reasonable price. Roller Bearings, Alemite-Zerk Lubrication and the Tilting Feeder are standard equipment on all sizes.

The One Who Forgot

By RUBY M. AYRES

Begin Here Today.
Peter Lyster, whose misery from such shock on the Western Front. Upon his return to London he fails to recognize the man who is standing before him as he had become engaged prior to his departure for France. Nan has since left London to go home and care for her three motherless stepchildren. She is still in touch with her friend Joan Endicott, in London, whose husband has been on leave and who is supposed to Nan. Peter is resting at the home of Arnold, a widower, situated not far from the Murrays' estate. Nan is jealous of Arnold's sister and disgusted with the attentions of Harley Sefton, money lender, who has told Nan that both Peter and her father owe him money and that payment will be demanded unless she agrees to marry him. In a woods near the Murrays' home Sefton is forced by Peter in the act of forcing his kisses upon Nan. Nan, afraid of what Sefton might say to the brain-sick man, tells him to go away and rushes back to her home.
Later Peter calls, but Nan refuses to see him. She is beginning to regret his impulsive action when she hears her father calling.
Now Go On With the Story.
Nan went out into the hall; Mr. Murray stood there, his spectacles up over his forehead. "If I am going to London tonight," he said abruptly, "he seemed to avoid meeting Nan's eyes. "I may see him some time—may will be all right here without me."
A little ironical smile crossed Nan's face, all right without him. Why she hardly ever saw him from one week's end to the other, save when she went to ask about his meals or for money for household expenses.
"Quite all right," she said. "Have you got enough money to go on the road?" he asked.
Nan colored; money had been her chief bugbear ever since she came home; she had soon found that there were many bills owing, bills, bills, hold expenses, and Nan hated debt; she had insisted on their being paid.
"Father, what do you know about Mr. Sefton?"
"Sefton?" he echoed. "Sefton! Nothing—except that he is a business acquaintance of mine. Why do you ask?"
Nan did not answer at once; then she said clearly: "Because this afternoon he asked me to marry him."
"Nan, hardly ever saw him for a fully a moment. He stared at his daughter with sheer amazement; then he look an uncertain step forward and nearly fell over in her face." "Asked you—to marry him? Are you sure?"
Nan looked away with a sudden sick feeling.
"Quite sure," she said coldly. "And you—what did you say, Nan?" "She realized that she would be quite willing to sell her—on the other terms."
"Held him—that if he insulted me again I would tell you a secret that would forbid him the house," she said clearly.
"You told him—that?" He fell back from her with anger in his eyes. "You dared to tell him that?" He tried to pull himself together. He went on hurriedly:
"There is no usual in asking a woman to marry you. I don't know what the girls of today expect. Sefton is a rich man; he could give you everything you want."
"Yes, so he told me."
"Well, well," he stammered in his anxiety, "what more do you require? He's a very decent fellow; he has been a good friend to me. I should like to see you married to him."
Nan's face flamed.
"I haven't the least doubt that you would," she said bitterly. Mr. Murray began pacing up and down the room.
"You mean to tell me that you sent him away?" he demanded truculently. You don't realize what this means to me; you don't."
"I realize perfectly well," Nan said steadily. "Mr. Sefton told me he would give me a hundred pounds before here."
"He told me that you owed him money," Nan said. "And that he was willing to cancel the debt in exchange for me."
"He told you—that?"
"There was no shame in his voice, only a sort of incredulous gladness that turned Nan sick."
He clutched her arm.
"And you refused—you didn't refuse? Even you could not be so selfish?"
Nan's eyes glazed.
"When it is true," she said.
"Then—of course I'll give him the five pounds I've managed to make since the infernal war broke out!"
"Father!" said Nan.
"If you were a dutiful girl you'd marry Sefton—and secure me. I'd want on furiously. "But you never

"If you were a dutiful girl you'd marry Sefton and secure me."

She felt that it was a safeguard to thrust Peter's name between them.
Arnott pulled his cap over his eyes and said: "I haven't been up to the breakfast," he said. "Chap seems to be worrying about something."
"Worrying?"
"Yes," Arnott did not look at her. "If I didn't know him so well, I should say he was worried—about business matters, but as it is... "You mean money?" Nan asked.
He shrugged his shoulders.
"I've always found him most scrupulous; one of the straightest chaps I know." He glanced down at her. "But you don't want me to tell you that."
"No," said Nan. "I don't need you to tell me that."
They were walking slowly down the garden, and Arnott suddenly turned, looking at her with pleading eyes.
"Miss Murray—you would if I ask you—a personal question?"
"No—please do." She thought she knew why he was coming. He ran an agitated finger round his coat in the pocket.
"It's about Lyster... I—would it be possible for any other fellow—to stand a ghost of a chance, I mean—a ghost of a chance—with you?"
The words were incoherent; his face was fiery red long before he had finished.
"Of course, I know people don't ever care twice in the same way—but... but if you met a decent chap—a chap who would go straight—and—be good to you—perhaps... in time... oh, I hope you don't hate me for asking you."
"I don't mind you asking me," she said, frankly. "Though I should hate it from some people. And I don't mind telling you—though there is hardly anyone else in the world I would tell—that I'm afraid I'm not one of those poor creatures—who can't forget—I've never cared for anyone except Peter in all my life." A little sick shock he'd "I don't think it's likely that I shall ever care for anyone else," she added.

Arnott squared his shoulders. "Thank you," he said quietly. "I understand." He stood beside her for a moment, then suddenly he caught her hand in his and raised it awkwardly to his lips.
Nan gave a little protesting cry, but somehow she was pleased, and before she could say a word he had stepped over the gate and was striding down the lawn at a tremendous rate.
There was a suspicious moisture in Nan's eyes as she looked after him.
"He'd make somebody a splendid husband," she thought. "I wish— I almost wish," but she did not finish the sentence.
What was the use of wishing anything?
She heard the boy's voices down the road, and the next moment they had turned the bend and were coming towards her with Peter Lyster himself.
It was too late for Nan to escape. They had all seen her, she knew, and Claude ran forward from the others towards her, calling out that he had found a hole's nest with four eggs in it.
Nan opened the gate. She felt as if she were walking on air.
"Oh, Claude!" she said reproachfully. She bent over the child to hide her face from Peter. "Oh, 2.

hope you didn't take them," she said.
"He wouldn't let me," he said with a backward jerk of his head in Peter's direction.
"Quite right, too," Nan declared. She had to meet Peter now; she forced her eyes to his face. (To Be Continued.)
A long walk is a step in the right direction.

Tim; it appeared, had gone back to France—his leave was at an end, and the world was desolate in consequence.
"I'm all alone again, Nan—Tim has gone, and I feel as if my heart will break. To have to stay in the house where we've had been so happy—without him—to have nothing to look forward to..."
Nan crumpled the letter angrily. Nothing to look forward to—when she herself would have sacrificed all the future for just one day-out-of-the-happy past.
For two days Nan saw nothing of Peter. John Arnott came over once, but he seemed distrust and nervous; he had lost his usual cheerfulness.
During the short while he was in the house he fidgeted about that room a good deal and talked jerkily; Nan was surprised to discover that he rather bored her; she was relieved when he rose to go.
"When shall I see you again?" he asked.
Nan was faintly amused.
"Whenever you like," she said.
"Come over when you like; I am always glad to see you."
"I wish I could believe that," he said bluntly.
"How is Mr. Lyster?" Nan asked.
