An Unsolvable Problem? Lincoln Journal: The fact that members of congress do play politics and that they are keen to utilize a situation when it is possible to benefit themselves politically makes it uncertain whether a real majority supported the McNary-Haugen plan of dealing with the agricultural surplus. It was fairly well known that Coolidge would veto it, because it contained the thing he most strenuously opposed, the equalization fee. It was also known that the house would not pass it over that veto. This was an ideal situation for the man who wished to curry favor with that element of the farmers demanding this particular piece of legislation. Men in office are fond of carrying favor with any considerable section of the electorate. The average man who must perform rely upon his representatives to properly digest proposals of such complexity is thus left perplexed. He cannot force himself to believe that a man of Coolidge's probity and interest in the welfare of all the people would deliberately deny to agriculture a sound remedy for a condition all admit exists. Yet on the other hand the measure did receive very strong support from both houses, and that is a guarantee of at least a belief that the plan would work advantageously. The president's objection to the equalization fee, waiving the question whether that could be constitutionally levied, was that its collection would require setting up of a great new piece of governmental machinery. Unless an absolute necessity, taxpayers do not want any more commissions with arbitrary and bureaucratic powers. He also pointed out that the only person it insured profit to was the middleman, and with no incentive to save he would waste. If that is true, who can defend it? He also said that it would aid foreign agricultural interests because in corn feeding, for instance, the feeder would conduct his operations where he could buy feed cheapest. If this plan would do this, it would strike at one of Nebraska's greatest industries. No substitute measure received even respectful consideration at the hands of congress, possibly because there was no organized demand for any other bill. The farmers do not agree on any remedy, nor do the economists. Are we to conclude that there is none, and must a great industry languish while the doctors dispute in the consulting room? Farmer Is Suicide. West Point, Neb., May 31.—John Sila, 44, farmer, committed suicide by hanging Wednesday. His body was found at 7 p. m., hanging from a rafter in the cat shed by a small daughter who had been sent to call him to supper. His wife and six children, the oldest 15 years, survive.

A Pauperless America. (Andre Sigfried in the Atlantic Monthly.) The majority of Frenchmen visiting America are amazed by the degree of material prosperity which has been reached, not only by an elite, but in general by the mass of the people. Books, articles, statistics, have of course, already long ago informed the European thinking public of this fact; but it is impossible to realize it without having, actually and physically, breathed the American atmosphere. When this has been the case, every visitor from the old countries readily admits that there is no common measure between the wages and the standards of living in the United States and in Europe. Comparing men of equal value, equal merit, equal training, the reward of labor shows differences which in certain cases appear almost shocking. In Asia and in Africa one still meets the appalling spectacle of human physical decay; pitiable crowds of crippled beggars are seen, whom nobody endeavors to cure. Europe has reached a stage where such a social scandal as this is unknown, but she still possesses her paupers, leading in some of the big manufacturing cities miserable lives, unworthy, indeed, of civilized human beings. In the United States such paupers may still occasionally be found, but on the whole they have ceased to be a normal feature of the present American society. Well, this social level of the states probably means as great a progress over Europe as Europe has achieved over Asia. If I had to state the main contribution brought to humanity by the American civilization, I should, I think, quote that physical and that material dignity of life which are guaranteed to the common American which he can always earn a decent salary and with it, lead a decent life. Chadron Remodeling. Chadron, Neb., May 31.—Remodeling of the Chadron Normal administration building will be completed for the opening of summer school the second week in June. Improvements will make the central section of the building fire proof, with cement and tile floors.

Two-Row Cultivators Cut Cultivating Costs The McCormick-Deering two-row cultivator, style UD, has the wide frame for cultivating corn and other crops planted in rows three feet four inches to three feet eight inches apart. Saves Time and Labor The McCormick-Deering two-row cultivator will practically cut your cultivating costs one half. You can cultivate within an acre as much in a day with the McCormick-Deering two-row as two men can with single-row cultivators. Just think of the extra time you can have during late spring and early summer—and time is valuable during these three months. Furthermore, during the later cultivating when you need to hurry to get your corn "laid by," you can well appreciate getting through it approximately twice as fast with the McCormick-Deering two-row as you can with a single-row cultivator. Two Widths of Frame The McCormick-Deering two-row known as style UD, is used with crops planted in standard widths; that is, 3 ft. 4 in. to 3 ft. 8 in. apart. The UD can also be equipped with the adjustable frame on special order, and is then designated as UP. Perfect Gang Control The gangs on the McCormick-Deering two-row cultivator shift together in pairs. By following one row you also follow the other, thereby making two-row cultivation as easy as with a single-row cultivator. Pressure on the foot pedals pivots the wheels and shifts the gangs with relation to the crop row. Furthermore, by means of a small lever the gangs can be locked so as to shift on the cultivator frame. This double means of shifting the gangs permits exceptionally close and accurate cultivation, an important feature to be taken advantage of at the time of first cultivation. For crops planted two rows at a time, the cross arch construction is used. With this type of arches the alternate gangs are fastened in pairs. Close or wide cultivation can be obtained by a lever directly in front of operator, which moves the gangs in or out from the crop rows. This manner of adjusting the width of cultivation permits setting the gangs wide when cross-cultivating checked corn. There is on delay necessitated by removing bolts and changing gangs on the arches, because this width is changed merely by operating a lever. For crops planted one row at a time there are the straight arches for the McCormick-Deering two-row. With this type of arch the two gangs on the right are tied in one pair and the two gangs on the left in another. Should the distance between the two rows vary, because of being planted separately, each set of gangs can be moved in or out to conform to this varying width. This feature is of advantage when cultivating corn which has been listed one row at a time. We can furnish repairs for any make of machine. Thompson & Bichel Wayne, Neb. Phone 308
