

Starts the New Year — In High Society — Fortyfour Per Cent of Weekly Newspapers Refuse to Advertise — Pre-

Celebrating New Year's eve with wild parties and bacchanalian revelries appeals to the average older as reflecting little if any of our modern sense.

The Babylonians began the year in March—time of the vernal equinox—and associated their festival with their sun god.

When Julius Caesar came along he started the new year January 1. Even now it seems the year a bit get started without having a wild time and staying up most of the night.

Notice the widely heralded debut of a girl in high New York society. Thousands of dollars were spent in giving her what is considered a proper send-off.

Liquor advertising. A survey shows that 44 per cent of the weekly publishers of the United States refuse to accept liquor advertising.

Editor's Platform. Every reputable newspaper editor has in mind certain principles which neither money nor hope of prestige can change.

May 30 Next Holiday. Most of the year's holidays when citizens switch themselves from accustomed channels, take place during the last six months of the year.

Looking to the New Year. Facing a new year, let us put away our hammers, and boost for more improvements.

Relatives Have Gathering. Mrs. John Surber was in Sioux City over Christmas with relatives who had not been together for about 30 years.

(Omaha Journal-Stockman) Anyone at all familiar with farmers knows that they are far from united on any agricultural program and this makes it difficult to make any plan effective. The truth of this was demonstrated a few days ago when Senator Capper called a conference of Kansas farmers to see if they could get together on what legislation was needed. The senator prepared for about 300 men and finally secured a hall in Topeka that would accommodate 1,000 or more, and still the hall was not large enough, many being unable to get in. They were not hand-picked farmers, none of them were on the federal or state pay rolls and they could and did say what they pleased. Man of the Year.

(Sioux City Journal) According to Time magazine, one Adolf Hitler is the "man of the year." Which is to say that he has been selected by the editors of that publication as the "most newsworthy" individual now in the public eye anywhere. This will be disappointing to a good many persons both here and abroad. It means—assuming now that Time's estimate of the newsworthiness of Herr Hitler is correct—that men like President Roosevelt, Prime Minister Chamberlain, Premier Daladier of France, Gen. Franco and various others must stand in line behind the nazi chieftain. It means, too, that John L. Lewis thus is placed so far back that one needs a telescope to see him. And where does it leave Joe Louis, the brown bomber, and Henry Armstrong? In the bleachers, to be sure. Herr Adolf is in the grandstand. Poor Benito Mussolini! Perhaps he is newsworthy only in that they permit him to carry water to der Fuehrer. Let no one quarrel with Time magazine for thus rating Adolf Hitler. He is the man of the year as far as news is concerned. The Journal agrees with Time's estimate of the nazi leader. He has made news repeatedly day after day throughout the year. It has been news of a gripping, frightening type, news that thrilled the whole world because it scared everybody into believing hateful war was imminent. It was news that aroused elemental emotions in men everywhere for Herr Hitler made them see to what lengths cruelty and injustice and brutality could be carried. It was news that came as a warning to every nation on earth, for today there is no doubt in the minds of common sense persons that nazism is a disease that threatens the world with destruction of the loftiest ideals in government and living. Hence nations already strong are making themselves more powerful in order to be ready against the day when Herr Hitler becomes the creator of the startling news that war has come again. If Bonaparte had lived in the 20th century and there had been no Adolf Hitler the great Napoleon would not have been so newsworthy as the nazi leader has become. For while the little corporal was a menace to decency in Europe he had no such weapons as Herr Hitler commands. Napoleon's threat was not so terrifying as Herr Hitler's. Of course they lived in different periods. There might be an opportunity for closer comparison between a Hitler of today and a modern Bonaparte. But—and there is comfort in the historic recollection—for Napoleon there were Waterloo and St. Helena. One does not need to be an astrologer to predict as bitter an end for Adolf Hitler, persecutor, vandal, scourger, tyrant and monster, who remains the man (or beast) of the hour in the view of civilization. The distinction thus accorded the nazi chieftain is one that decent men the world over would neither desire nor cherish.

Age and Wisdom.

(Auburn Herald) Sometimes you hear it said of an older man: "He ought to know his business. He's been working at it 30 years." But that may not mean much. It all depends on how he made use of his experience—whether or not he invested it year after year and made it part of his business capital. If there came a time when he was content to coast along without putting forth the energy that his business demanded, he has not used his experience to the best advantage. If, at any time during his career, he has allowed himself to get out of correspondence with business environment, he then and there ceased to grow and develop along with his business and soon became a "has been" so far as business success was concerned. With all of his 30 years experience, it is quite possible that some young fellow actually knows more about the same lines of business than he does. He knows how to apply new methods that Old Timers disregard; he knows how to put into practice the psychology of business and how to foresee changes to which he can adapt himself before they actually come.

Farmers Are Not Communists.

(Omaha Journal-Stockman.) A good many people have been inclined to poke fun at the hearings of the Dies committee investigating the activities of foreign organizations in this country and the menace these carry to American institutions. It must be admitted, however, that some things have been brought out that should give us all a warning. For instance, it developed that the object of communist activity was to bring farmers and laborers together in an organization. Naturally there is much sympathy with farmers for the workers in the cities and towns and the combination of farmers and laborers would constitute a political block whose influence would be far reaching. Where it was tried out, however, farmers soon learned that they were supposed to be the silent partners in the deal. Farmers came to resent the evident favoritism to labor, as testified by Representative Clifford Hope of the Kansas seventh district, and it has not been shown that labor has much in common with the farmer. At least the two have not been seen anywhere weeping on each other's shoulders. They each have their interests and assume to know their own affairs. "We can be on the lookout for communists and their sly tricks," declares the Kansas City Star. "To our possible benefit the Dies committee has exposed a good batch of them. They like that boring from within business, of which the chairman now speaks. But it would take more than boring from within to bring about a workable cohesion of farmers and labor. On that job the communists would be especially poor mixers."

Self Help Is Best Help.

(Omaha Journal-Stockman.) Many superficial and shortsighted economist are still busy in devising and suggesting plans for the government to help the people, to extend loans, to provide pensions, insurance, food, clothing, housing, education and recreation. There is also a growing belief in other quarters that these activities have already involved the government too far, that the costs of the program are becoming overwhelming, and at the same time the enterprise and initiative of the people are being undermined. It was not government aid that made this a great nation; it was the encouragement of independence and individual enterprise that built America into the most progressive and advanced nation on earth.

Independence Is Vital.

(Danville (Ill.) Commercial News) The deep-seated independence of the American farmer is reflected in the "platform for agriculture" of the executive committee of the National Grange. It is based upon views expressed at the recent convention of this oldest national farm organization. This program affirms determined opposition to any legislation which may result in "either immediate or eventual regimentation of the farmer." It also opposes "any concentration of authority or infringement of state's rights."

In other words, the National Grange stands resolutely opposed to making the farmer a cog in a huge political machine operated from Washington. What is done through a "soil conservation program" or by other legislation to improve the farmer's position should be based on the importance to the whole nation of prosperity and a fair deal for agriculture. This importance cannot well be over-stressed. Economically the farmer is buying an essential factor in orderly flow of industrial production and employment for city workers. One of the outstanding aspects of every serious depression is lack of balance between the prices farmers and other primary producers receive and what they must pay for goods they buy. This soon is reflected in idle factories and lack of employment in industrial centers.
