FARM NEWS REVIEW AND FORECAST

"Our Roots Are In This Land"

Farm Business Records

Better Poultry Prices Expected This Year...

The beginning of a new year brings with it the reminder that it is time to plan for the year ahead. It also calls to mind the annual income tax statements. Detailed information about the farm business is helpful in planning the farm business as well as in making income tax statements.

Why Keep Farm Records?

Business records are valuable only if they are used. Here are some of the reasons for keeping complete farm business records.

- 1 Records indicate the financial position of the farmer and show the progress he makes from year to year. A net worth statement provides the basis for credit with lending agencies.
- 2 Records provide the basis for studying the farm business. Points of strength and weakness in the business become evident.
- 3 Farm records provide the basic information for farm planning. The best information regarding crop yields, livestock production, feed requirements and operation costs comes from a set of records for a period of years.
- 4 Records provide information regarding all transactions. This information is useful in showing what bills have been paid and items that have been sold. These accounts also show the total cash received and spent during the year.
- 5 Records provide the necessary information for making income tax reports. Accurate information is essential. It is easier to forget numerous small items of expense than to forget income. Records will enable the farmer to make an accurate income tax statement.

Essential Records

Record books will provide only that information which the businessman records during the year. In order to get detailed information about the business it is necessary for a farmer to keep a good set of records.

The farm record book should provide space for the following information:

- (1) a complete inventory of all assets owned—land, buildings, machinery, livestock, feed, grain and supplies—including values and condition of each item;
- (2) all transactions, both receipts and expenses;
- (3) production records on crops and livestock that are essential in studying the farm business.

Feed records on livestock enterprises are important on livestock farms because feed constitutes from 50 to 90 percent of the total cost of producing livestock. Keeping a feed record need not be burdensome. Estimates at the end of the year of the amount fed to each class of livestock are seldom accurate. It is not difficult to check the amount fed one day of the month and then estimate the amount fed for the month. Another method is to keep a record of the times the self-feeder is filled or the number of times feed is ground for mixing for the livestock rations. Livestock breeding records are a part of good livestock management.

Records of crops grown on each field and the amounts of fertilizer applied or other treatments are useful in analyzing the farm business. One convenient method of recording crop information is to draw a farm map. On each field can be recorded the kind of crop grown, variety planted, the yield per acre, amounts of fertilizer applied and any other special treatments.

Two record books are distributed by the University of Nebraska. These are available at the offices of the county extension agents and also through the Agricultural Extension Service of the College of Agriculture. The Nebraska Farm Account Book is designed to provide all the information needed for income tax returns and also lends itself readily to a study of the farm business. Forms and instructions for making a summary and analysis are included in the record book. The Nebraska Income Tax Record is designed primarily for making income tax statements, but can also be used for farm business analysis and studying financial programs.

Analysis of Records

The most fundamental value of business records comes from studying the records and using this information to increase the net income. Too many farm records are used for income tax purposes only. Space does not permit a complete outline of farm record analysis, but a few suggestions will illustrate the kind of analysis that can be made.

GROSS INCOME—Totaling all cash receipts and adding net inventory increases will give you the gross income. Does this indicate a sufficient size of business to provide for efficient operation and a satisfactory net income? A considerable number of farmers in Nebraska do not have sufficient gross income to provide a satisfactory living for the farm family.

RATES OF PRODUCTION—Crop yields are easily determined. The rate of production of livestock can be obtained by calculating eggs produced per hen, milk produced per cow, pigs saved per litter, percent of calf crop and lamb crop and weight of animals at weaning time.

EFFICIENCY OF OPERATION—The three major cost items in farm operation are feed, machinery cost and labor.

1 Feeding Efficiency—Sales of livestock plus inventory increases less livestock purchased divided by the value of feed gives the returns per $1 of feed fed. This can be calculated for each class of livestock. Feed cost should include the value of pasture as well as the value of hay, grain and commercial feed. As a rough guide, the following might be used as minimum returns per $1 feed fed in order to break even: hogs, $1.20; feeder cattle, $1.20; dairy cattle, $1.75. These vary considerably, depending on the individual farm situation.

2 Machinery Costs—The total cost of machinery is the cash expense for machinery repairs, fuel, oil and grease, cost of machinery hired, depreciation on all machinery less income from use of machinery. Important questions to consider are—Is the investment in machinery too high? Are all the machines necessary? Could some of the operations be hired done as satisfactorily and at less cost? Could some of the money invested in machinery be used to better advantage for some other purpose? Can the size of farm be increased to use machinery more efficiently?

3 Labor Efficiency—Most of the labor on Nebraska farms is furnished by the farm family. Using labor more efficiently may not directly reduce the cost of operation. It may provide for a more satisfactory living by providing some leisure time. Using labor more efficiently on one enterprise may make possible better care of another enterprise and thus increase the profits from the farm business.

These are only a few suggestions in studying the records. Time spent in reviewing past accomplishments and planning for the future may bring as high or higher returns as the time spent cultivating corn or feeding hogs.

Each year about this time many experts appraise the economic status of different branches of the poultry industry and issue their predictions for the coming year. There is enough statistical and historical evidence to provide a sound basis for reasonably accurate predictions under usual conditions.

Cycles of production and prices and data on numbers of birds in flocks, quantities of products in storage, and growers' production intentions provide the poultry economist with valuable information for diagnosing the economic health of the industry.

A year ago it was well known and widely publicized that number of layers, broilers, and turkeys would be at high levels through 1954 and that returns from these enterprises were likely to be unsatisfactory. Not many observers expected broiler production to continue for so long at a high but unprofitable level.

Returns to egg producers have been even less satisfactory than most would have predicted. Turkey producers have fared about as well or slightly better than could have been expected at this time a year ago.

In view of these statements it may seem puzzling why poultry producers pay so little heed to outlook statements in planning their operations. Although investment in equipment and stock and need for a source of income reduce the flexibility of production considerably, producers are apparently less directly influenced by future economic probabilities than they are by past economic certainties. This is especially true of the farm flockowner who supplies most of the eggs in Nebraska and in the North Central region from Nebraska to Ohio.

Most outlook statements indicate that the last six months of 1955 is likely to be much more favorable to egg producers than the same period in 1954. This would be a pretty safe prediction even without the statistical data mentioned above. No industry is likely to go through a period of such adverse price and cost relationships without some pretty severe belt tightening and some production cuts.

Late Chick Season in 1955

Farmers who started early chicks last year were hardest hit by the price squeeze. In addition to an abnormally low fall egg market, the discrimination against pullet eggs was especially heavy during the period when early flocks began production.

The price of 18.5¢ received by Nebraska farmers for their eggs in September was actually less than they had received in March, the reverse of the usual seasonal price movement. As a result early flock replacements will be down very sharply. On January 1, 1955, eggs in incubators in the North Central region were down 42% from a year ago. It is unlikely that this wide margin of drop will carry through into later months, but most hatcherymen expect a late chick season.

Since last year's chick season was an early one, with chick placements dropping off abnormally fast after the egg price break in mid-spring, there may be some justification for expecting some strength in the egg market earlier than usual. Industry optimists are predicting such a rise as early as March; more conservative estimates suggest May. A price rise in either month can be expected to encourage some increased late-season chick replacement activity.

January Egg Month

The Poultry and Egg National Board pulled all the stops in its drive to encourage consumption of eggs during January. The U.S.D.A. officially participated more actively this year than in the past. State and local groups were asked to participate in the promotional program.

The increasing number of such drives by various commodity groups using commercial advertising techniques to persuade the consumer to buy the products of poultry producers, dairy producers, beef or citrus growers, is causing considerable comment among the farm people.

Those who question the value of such activities point out that the human stomach and the food dollar are just so large. If one branch of agriculture gains by such promotion, another must lose since consumers merely substitute one food for another. The net effect is a loss to agriculture as a whole because of the increased cost of advertising. The only way agriculture as an industry can gain is to divert consumer's dollars from other uses to food.

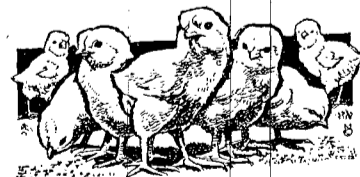

Some of the gains claimed for such drives may be coincidental with other more effective factors. Poultry production expanded during the last 15 years through very greatly increased economics of production and improved product quality even though prices rose less than for other livestock products.

Cheaper foods of higher quality represent a persuasive factor in getting sales at the grocery store. Some sympathy is due the producer who feels that if sales of his product and profits are temporarily increased, new producers will promptly appear to share those profits, resulting in no change in the original situation.

He may feel that the only real beneficiaries are the service industries who get their returns on a unit or volume basis. At any rate he seems inclined to let them pay the bill for advertising.

There is another aspect to this problem, however. There probably is no such thing as a "food dollar". It's a consumer dollar for which food must compete along with an increasingly large number of other consumer items, not all of which make as much of a contribution to the general welfare as good food.

It is unlikely that the producers of cigarettes, soap, or salad dressing will reduce their advertising budgets just because poultry producers fail to support P.E.N.B. Many manufacturers regularly spend more for advertising than for raw materials. The promotional activities for farm products have so far been on a much more conservative scale.

The Federal Budget

1955 - 56

The administration's budget for the 1955-56 fiscal year includes estimated total receipts of $60 billion and expenditures of $62.4 billion. This represents a reduction of $1.1 billion in expenditures and an increase of $1 billion in receipts over the current year. If Congress appropriates the amounts requested, and if the expected receipts are realized, the budget will fail to balance by $2.4 billion. The President asked that no further tax cuts be made at this time since last year's $7.4 billion reduction prevented a balanced budget this year.

Almost two-thirds, 65 cents, of each budget dollar will go for national security; 24 cents for interest, benefits to veterans, and grants to states; the remaining 11 cents will be spent for other governmental activities. The individual income tax is expected to provide 48 cents of each dollar of receipts; 26 cents will come from the corporate income tax; 15 cents from excise taxes; 11 cents from other sources.

The budget for agriculture and agricultural resources calls for almost $1 billion less for price support activities reflecting lower support prices and reduced acreages. Other activities for which less money is asked include the international wheat agreement, federal crop insurance, and disaster loans.

The largest increase for agricultural activities, $73 million, is asked for the agricultural conservation program. An increase of $67 million is requested for surplus disposal. Increases of $15-20 million each are requested for farm credit, rural electrification and telephone, and research, extension and other agricultural services.
