A NEW ENGRAVER has been installed at the Wayne Herald office to facilitate better photo coverage and to aid in advertising procedures. Editor Fred Gibbs places a picture on the machine which will be engraved on a zinc plate and ready for printing within minutes. Anyone interested can stop in the Herald office and watch the process, one of the newest inventions in engraving work.

Herald Installs Engraver To Aid News, Advertisers

Photographs and some other printed material in this week's Wayne Herald were made on a new high speed electronic engraving machine just installed at the Herald plant.

The machine, known as the Photo-Lathe Automated Engraver, scans original photos which have been placed on a revolving cylinder and simultaneously cuts the scanned image into a metal plate attached to a second cylinder.

In addition to photographs, the machine also produces black and white printing plates from pen and ink drawings, charts, maps and advertisements on a hard, cellulose acetate material. This feature offers advertisers additional advantages.

Basically, the device is a simplified lathe to which has been added high fidelity scanning amplifiers and optical scanning and cutting heads. Once started, the machine is automatic and operates unattended, shutting off its own switches upon completion of each plate.

The machine was introduced by Graphic Electronics, Inc., LaSalle, Ill., earlier this year and the Herald was one of the early newspapers to order it in an effort to provide new innovations for news coverage and advertising procedures.

Bond Sales Lagging As Wayne County Is Last takes a good plan of life insurance to provide protection for a family of any size and do it an economical way. Such a plan should enable you to provide protection for the breadwinner, the mother and all the children without becoming a financial burden. Our Family Plan can do just that for you. It's low in cost, yet takes into consideration every member of the family — and new arrivals too! Let me show you what I mean. There's no obligation.

BUTLER STOR-N-FEED™

Oxygen-controlled storage at lowest cost-per-bushel!

Butler Stor-N-Feed is an entirely new kind of tank designed for safe, long-term storage of wet grain. Stor-N-Feed provides greater protection because:

1. THE EXCLUSIVE BRIGHT WHITE SURFACE of the Stor-N-Feed tank reflects the sun's heat, which causes greater expansion of gases inside the tank—also keeps down mixing of gases and dilution of preservative carbon dioxide gas.
2. THE EXCLUSIVE BREATHING CHAMBER* (a steel chamber built into the foundation) constantly forces the carbon dioxide along a slow, tortuous path—preventing it from mixing readily with the oxygen.

In addition, Butler Stor-N-Feed is lowest in per bushel cost. This is true because Stor-N-Feed is the first coated steel tank that has been specially designed for high-moisture grain.

Call us now for all the details. We are your authorized Butler Agri-Builder and can plan and build according to your exact needs. Financing available. *Patent pending.

Conservation Notes

Water can also be our enemy. We dread the power of water when we see flooded streams, and the destruction they leave behind.

Water will be our friend or our enemy, depending largely on how we treat and manage the land on our farms and ranches in our watersheds. Good care of the gifts of soil and water to be used and enjoyed. He also gave us the responsibility for their care. One has only to see a flood scape of beauty or taste pure sparkling water or good food to know that our responsibility is worth fulfilling.

Most Wayne county churches are observing this week as Soil Stewardship Week. It is a time to remember that as man cares for the soil and water, so God should care for man.

A geographical error stated in last week's column that the till-method was $7.50 less per acre than Conservation method. This should have been $7.50 less than conventional methods.

What You Should Know In Choosing the Family Home Select Neighborhood To Fill Family Need First

Which is more important in choosing a home for your family—the house or the neighborhood?

The United States Savings and Loan League suggests that each may be equally important, but that the wise home buyer probably will select a neighborhood suiting his family's needs and desires before looking for an individual house.

The League is currently providing information for home buyers in its new color film production, "What You Should Know Before You Buy a Home," and in a "Home Buyer's Check List" distributed to viewers of the film.

In the Check List the League warns that too many families find the right house and neglect to inquire about the neighborhood in which they will be living.

Here are some of the suggestions made in the Check List:

The careful home buyer should look to see whether street and lot patterns in the neighborhood are arranged for appearance, convenience and safety and whether the site plans and designs of the neighborhood homes are attractively varied. He and his family should also decide whether the neighborhood landscaping is pleasing and will continue to be so over a period of years.

The home buyer wishing to protect the value of what may be the biggest investment of his lifetime should satisfy himself that zoning laws protect the residential character of the neighborhood and that most homes in the neighborhood, including the one he considers purchasing, are in the same general price range.

Adequacy of community services is another fundamental in choosing a neighborhood. For example: Are streets paved and well maintained?

Is there a proper sewage and storm drainage system?

Are water and electricity, gas, telephone service and other utilities provided at reasonable cost?

Is there mail delivery, garbage pick up and police and fire protection?

Part of the economics of buying a home includes calculation of the community tax level in the family budget. Taxes should be consistent with the services provided, the League warns.

Looking to the future, the home buyer's budget must be flexible enough to meet the expenses of special assessments or new bond issues in the community.

Accessibility is another critical factor in judging a neighborhood. Families with children will want to be close to the proper schools and to parks and playgrounds, and most families will prefer convenient local stores, athletic and entertainment facilities and a church of their own denomination.

In addition to nearby facilities, the home buyer needs fast and frequent bus or train transportation to his place of employment, larger shopping and business areas, cultural attractions and inter-city transportation terminals.

Another less tangible, but vital aspect of picking a neighborhood is the question of congeniality.

Generally, neighbors with similar educational and social backgrounds and those in a common income bracket get along better than people who vary widely in such characteristics. Neighbors of the same age and with children in the same age groups are usually preferable.

When the home buyer has found a friendly, convenient and economically suitable neighborhood in which to live, then it's time for him to pick out the one house which best suits his family's needs and desires.

Closely related to home design is the question of space, and here the requirements are closely tied to individual family needs.

The League recommends that a home buyer ask himself the following questions:

Can the whole family be seated in the living room without crowding and are there enough bedrooms for parents, children and children to come?

Are bathroom facilities sufficient for periods of peak use by the family?

Parents with small children are aware of the value of adequate space for children to play indoors.

Experts suggest that there should be at least four feet of clothes closet rod space for each member of the family, three feet of closet rod space near the front entrance and adequate utility space.

Growing families should consider whether additions can be built at reasonable cost on the home they are thinking of buying.

Another important consideration in house buying is lot size and orientation.

If possible, the lot on which a house is built should be large enough to insure privacy, including the possibility of adjacent construction after the family moves in.

Another aspect of the same question is whether the view from the house is pleasant and likely to remain unchangeable in the future.

It is preferable in most climates that the house be oriented so that the living room and bedrooms are not exposed to the hot afternoon sun.

A lot graded to drain rain water away from the house is a real trouble saver for the home owner.

In choosing a house, every family must be guided by its present and potential income. Within the limits of sound financing, the home a family buys is one of the best investments possible if it is carefully chosen.

Two of the most widely quoted rules of thumb for home buyers according to the League, are that (1) a family can afford to purchase a home costing roughly two and one-half times its total annual income and (2) a family can afford roughly one week's salary for each month's total housing expenses.

Perhaps the second maxim is the most useful, since it is the monthly outlay which most immediately affects the family's standard of living.

In budgeting monthly housing expenses, the family must include the monthly repayment of the loan made to buy the home, including principal, interest, insurance and taxes. The family should also include an estimate of monthly expenses for repair and maintenance and the monthly cost of heat and utilities. It may also add monthly payments on furniture or household goods purchased with credit.

In addition to monthly payments, the family budget must include the outlay for initial housing expenses, including the down payment and closing costs and any immediate repair and modernization. Furniture, appliances and household goods purchased with cash, and taxes and insurance paid at the outset are also among the initial expenses.

Home Ownership Reality For 6 Of 10 Families

Every family in a home of its own... This is the American dream—and it's not too far from coming true.

Today, more than six out of every ten families own their own homes. This is an abrupt increase since 1940, when four out of every ten families were home owners.

ferent for each family. The average person must seek expert advice to determine whether a house meets proper standards of construction. A reputable builder or real estate agent is the number one guarantee that the home buyer will make a proper choice in this respect. However, observation and common sense will answer some of the construction questions that a home buyer should ask.

For instance, does the house have adequate protection against termites, including the complete separation of wood from the ground?

The cause of large cracks and signs of seepage may be more important than their existence itself, but they are warning signals which should be investigated.

Also check to see if insulation and weather stripping are adequate and if the trim fits neatly around doors and windows.

The home buyer should ask the builder or real estate agent whether the drain and storm sewage system will prevent basement flooding and whether the roof is free of leaks. He should also determine whether the heating, hot water and electrical systems are adequate for his family's needs.

Another important question, often overlooked, is whether a vapor barrier has been built into the walls of the house to help prevent paint from peeling or blistering.

Appreciation of the design of a home is a personal thing. Obviously, no family should buy a home which it finds displeasing in appearance. Nevertheless, when they have satisfied their own tastes, there are a number of more objective questions that need to be asked.

Among them is whether the design is convenient to the normal traffic pattern of every day living. A step saving kitchen and the separation of bedrooms from living area for privacy and silence will prove of immense benefit over the years.

In most cases, design should take advantage of sunlight and natural ventilation.

As a personal requirement of each particular family, the home they choose should be appropriate to whatever furnishings and household goods which they have or expect to purchase.

In terms of market value, it is best to avoid house designs which may rapidly go out of fashion and automatically decrease the resale price of the home.

Closely related to home design is the question of space, and here the requirements are closely tied to individual family needs.

The League recommends that a home buyer ask himself the following questions:

Can the whole family be seated in the living room without crowding and are there enough bedrooms for parents, children and children to come?

Are bathroom facilities sufficient for periods of peak use by the family?

Parents with small children are aware of the value of adequate space for children to play indoors.

Experts suggest that there should be at least four feet of clothes closet rod space for each ers. Now, more families than not have homes of their own, while 20 years ago, just the reverse was true.

Some economists estimate that, considering the steady climb in family incomes, virtually every family will be able to own its own home by 1970.

There has been a tremendous economic revolution in the United States in the last two decades. It has created a huge financially-secure middle class. One of the healthy aspects of the mounting income of these families is that they have directed their growing funds to better living. Wise investments have been the rule.

Thousands of families have used their extra income to buy homes. For most of them, this has been the biggest investment of their lives, as well as the one that has given them the greatest sense of pride and joy.

Along with the increase in home ownership, the home has regained its position as the center of family life. The emergence of indoor-outdoor living, the popularity of recreation rooms and the convenience of today's homes have all had a part in this wholesome trend.

More teenagers and more couples look to their homes today as the place where they prefer to do their entertaining.

A mark of the times, too, is the fact that more newlyweds than ever before are starting their married lives in their own homes.

Surveys disclose that many couples start buying their own homes at age 25. This is in direct contrast to a generation ago, when the purchase of a home was a step taken comparatively late in the life of a family.

New home ownership in recent years has been made available to lower and middle income groups through smaller down payments, longer maturity periods for mortgages, lower interest rates and lower monthly payments. In fact, many families have found that the monthly payments on their homes have amounted to little more—and often less—than they used to pay out in rent. The big difference, from the standpoint of the purse, is that they now have something to show for their money—not just a collection of worthless real estate receipts.

President Kennedy recently urged the construction of new homes so that the nation can move ever closer to the goal of decent home in a suitable living environment for every American family.

the advantages of gas for whole house
air conditioning*

There are three major advantages in a gas whole house air conditioning system: (1) economy of operation, because natural gas is one of the most thrifty and efficient of fuels. (2) quietness of operation, because the motor is a whisper of flame. (3) low upkeep and long life, because a flame replaces a compressor and compressor motor and consequently there are fewer moving parts to wear out and cause trouble. And, of course, gas whole house air conditioning can be added on to most gas heating systems, for low cost installation.

Blue Star Guide Giving Home Buyers Confidence

Be it large or small, palatial or modest, the purchase of a new home is generally the biggest investment a family will ever make. This is why more and more home buyers are using the Blue Star Home symbol as a reliable guide to better living.

The Blue Star on a home means that the builder has included at least three modern gas appliances and made provision for the installation of a fourth gas appliance.

The Blue Star on a home means that the appliances have met rigid standards for safety, durability and quiet operation at the American Gas Association Testing Laboratories.

Blue Star Homes all offer design features that provide modern, comfortable family living. The kitchen, bath and utility rooms, for example, must be approved by the local gas company.

While the builder must include gas cooking, water heating and house heating equipment meeting standard set forth by the Blue Star Home program, he may choose the equipment from among a wide selection of leading manufacturers.

Those visitors to Blue Star Homes will find the latest models of gas appliances on display. Many builders also include gas air conditioning, refrigerators, garbage disposers and washers-dryers to round-out the all-gas home concept. Gaslights, too, are widely used for outdoor illumination.

Builders in Blue Star Homes are deemed to provide maximum convenience and modernity. Smart new conveniences are the most completely automatic cooking appliances to be had today. Built-in gas ovens, broilers and surface units also permit maximum flexibility in kitchen arrangement.

Many women are specifying the new gas automatic broiler that can be built into a brick or stone wall, or set into a wood or steel cabinet. Also popular are the new wall-hung side-by-side oven and broiler units. Four top burners are located below and slide into place when the cooking shelf is lowered.

Gas water heaters in Blue Star Homes provide plentiful supplies of hot water economically and automatically. They can be located in the basement, utility area or in a closet in the kitchen.

For house heating and air conditioning, there is nothing that can equal the economy, efficiency and dependability of gas. Some central systems combine heating and cooling in one compact unit for year-round comfort. All modern gas central heating and air conditioning systems circulate clean, filtered warm or cool air to all parts of the house.

To find out the location of Blue Star Homes in your community, call your local gas company.

Gaslights Enjoying A 'Comeback' Year

The enchantment of a garden needn't be wasted when the sun sets. Outdoor gaslights turn the garden into a charming place for nighttime relaxing, dining and entertaining.

Gaslight heightens the enchantment, too, with interesting shadows, silhouettes and a soft golden glow. But gaslights have utility as well as decorative purpose. They will continue to operate when other lighting sources fail.

They can also be controlled manually or automatically with special dimming devices. One manufacturer offers a gaslight that turns on automatically at sun-down and turns itself off at sun-up. And, says the American Gas Association, you can choose from a wide variety of handsome gaslight styles in keeping with your Blue Star home—from Old Colonial to ultra-modern.

For conversation and relaxation on the open terrace, wall bracket gas lamps are unobtrusive and pleasant. The distinctive golden light repels insects and keeps the entire area softly lit.

Gaslights are equally useful and decorative when used for drive ways, front walks, porches, patios, and garage. Installation is simple and comparatively inexpensive. Local gas companies are a good source for information regarding styles, prices, operating costs and installation.

"Don't Build 'Em Like They Usta," Better Now

Modern building "know-how" has made today's new home the best built in history.

It is a tightly built home, constructed of durable materials that are easily maintained. Its excellent insulation means savings in air conditioning bills in summer and heating bills in winter. The house is built to last for years.

Moreover, today's new home is designed with the comfort, convenience and living habits of its potential owners in mind. It was planned for people. It no longer is a mere enclosure of rooms.

The graceful lines and open living space of today's new home reflects the popular trend toward informal living, with the line between indoors and outdoors all but vanished at will.

There has been an immense increase in use of standardized components in the building of a house. This is a distinct advantage to the home buyer, for use of components rather than small pieces means a saving in labor costs in the building of the home. Use of components that are standardized means they have been precision made for tighter fitting.

But while the use of standardized components has risen, there is no "typical" American home. The one-story rambler or ranch house is popular in some areas. But Colonial styles also have their followers. In high-cost urban areas, the two or three story "Town house" is enjoying a dramatic revival. This is particularly true in areas of urban renewal. Contemporary homes, which invite variations in style, frequently are the characteristic of a new residential area.

Regardless of the type of house, the average new home today provides more than 1,230 square feet of living space. The majority of them have three or more bedrooms and the two-bathroom house is on the increase.

The best way to judge the new homes is to visit those on display.

Cluster Grouping Of Homes Yields More Open Space

New ways of grouping houses are being explored to permit more reasonable population densities and still preserve usable open space and other amenities.

Among variations from the traditional patterns of locating houses on their lots, cluster zoning offers imaginative possibilities. There are numerous patterns that the cluster arrangement can take, but the buildings always are grouped on one part of the land and an open space is preserved, usually in the rear of the homes. This can include not only a patio or similar area for each house but an open space to provide all the homes in the cluster with a vista or a recreational area.

Such fresh approaches to residential land use are needed because of the mounting costs of subdivision and zoning specifications based on the prevailing increase in per capita consumption of land.

Arrangements such as cluster zoning offer the potential advantages of preserving open space, reducing lot sizes, lowering costs and providing not only variety in design but also a better circulation pattern.

Further testing and application of this type of development are being carried forward by builders, planners, developers and architects.

However, relatively few have advanced beyond the planning stage. The chief obstacles are subdivision and zoning specifications based on the prevailing single-lot development concept. Many zoning specifications leave no room for deviation or experimentation.

However, there are increasing examples of planned unit developments having the advantage of an overall concept, embracing a fairly large area. These developments contain a variety of housing and land use types. But, again, many zoning ordinances have inadequate provision for this kind of residential development.

In cases where progress has been reported, home builders and city councils have cooperated to work out amendments to the zoning ordinances.

Bright New Panel Surfaces Suited to Family Room Decor

Chances are good that if you move into a new house one area on the floor plan will be marked "family room." It might be an area directly off the kitchen, or, especially in split level, under the bedroom wing, perhaps.

Whenever it is located, the family room can be an all-purpose area. It might be the family dining room, a place to pursue hobbies, it might be oriented to children, or for adult play.

Individual needs can vary, but one thing seems constant. A family room is bound to be an activity area and is likely to get a lot of use and quite possibly hard use.

A study of new products can be helpful in deciding what materials builders recommend for family room paneling. Among the whole array of new materials that look better than ever and are planned to save installation time and money, one has made spectacular advances in the last few years.

New Glamor
This material is hardboard, a familiar utilitarian product which has taken on new glamor for it is designed for these new applications in today's modern home. Once the "ugly duckling" of the construction field, it has been decked out with bright new faces that have brought it acceptance in the best rooms in the house.

A family room may not be as elegant as a Victorian front parlor, but it can have beauty and still use walls and ceiling materials that will stand hard knocks and are easy to keep clean, just by wiping smudges off the smooth, pre-finished surface.

Without sacrificing its ease of application and maintenance, hardboard manufacturers now produce paneling in many finishes, including wood grain plastic coated, oiled, sanded, perforated, corrugated, ribbed or striated.

Wide Selection
This wide selection makes it simple for builders to achieve any look home owners want, depending upon the use the family will make of the room. Since informality is the general rule for a family room, home owners might want to use large areas of wood grain paneling. Or, to be as inventive as fancy permits in having the family room reflect its occupants' personality through the imaginative combination of hardboard surface treatments.

Whatever textures or patterns are selected, whether the choice is a pre-finished hardboard or plain panels painted to suit a particular color scheme, home owners have the assurance that this material will withstand hard use.

Hardboard is child-proof and teen-resistant. That's why one of its popular uses is as a wainscoting along the lower part of the wall in hallways.

One thing you'll want to plan for in any family room is plenty of storage. Hardboard is a versatile material for built-ins, and perforated hardboard is invaluable for space-saving hanging storage. When finishing the family room, home owners might consider having a whole wall of perforated hardboard, to hang hobby equipment, shelving and decorations.

New Panel Products Created by Research

Intensive research has been the keystone of the hardboard industry's growth during the past few years since it was first produced commercially in 1928.

Starting with its natural advantages as a material of dimensional stability and dent resistance, its quality has been advanced through development programs aimed at creating specific new products for specific new home applications.

Today research activity has reached its greatest pitch. The goal has been to produce not just hardboard, but a wide variety of hardboard panel products offering a wide range of physical properties and appearances for the new home builder and owner. Because of this concept, totally new kinds of hardboard, exterior siding and interior panel products for the construction industry have resulted.

Light Before You Select Coloring

Each year homebuyers carefully select colors and furnishings to enhance home decor, and then wonder one night why they don't seem to come to life in the home.

Colors and textures that are brought to life by good lighting in the store can be lost in the murky shadows of an ill-lighted home, the American Home Lighting Institute points out.

Without good lighting, the most expensive and tastefully decorated room is a waste of money.

On the other hand, lighting is used as a decorative tool by those homeowners who know and appreciate its value in enhancing color, design and texture.

Good lighting, the Institute says, can even make the most economical decor look better than its cost would indicate.

Here are some of the ways fixture lighting can keep various decorating elements in proper perspective and add interest to the room:

- Accenting the room accents by illuminating colorful interior walls, paintings and art objects.

- Emphasizing patterns and textures by carefully lighting draperies, fabrics and surfaces.

- Highlighting conversation corners, sofas, dining tables and buffets by spotlighting these areas.

Descriptive Term
The name hardboard is an excellent descriptive term. Hardboard panels are literally very hard in composition and are truly boards since they are made of wood and in the shape of a board or panel.

New Approach to Building Added Protection to Buyer

If you are planning to buy a new home, you should find out as much as possible about the materials and equipment included in the home. Discuss these details with the builder and compare operating costs of various fuels to make certain that the house heating and other appliances offer the best value in economy of operation. Your local gas company will be happy to assist you in making a comparison of costs. Before the war, most homes in the United States were custom built. A family needing a new home contacted a builder, and arranged to have the house built. Today, however, the picture has changed radically. Builders now erect homes, ranging anywhere from 25 to several thousand, on a tract of land and then advertise for buyers.

This requires a great deal of money. Builders, like families, must borrow the money from banks and leading institutions. According to the American Gas Association which sponsors a Blue Star Home program, this new approach to home building has brought added protection to the family that eventually buys the house. Because, says AGA, both the homebuyer and the lender want security of their investment.

Of some 25,000 lending institutions in the U. S., about 7,000 account for 80% of all mortgage and construction loans.

building since their opinions set the standards for the rest of the lenders.

Last year, the FHA Administrator sent a directive to all FHA field offices directing them to lower income requirements on more expensive homes provided the builder can demonstrate that the materials and equipment in his homes require less monthly maintenance and upkeep.

Application of this principle also makes it possible for home buyers to carry longer mortgages without increasing monthly housing expenses, thus making more money available for other betterments.

Specifically, part of the FHA letter reads: "In addition to the exercise of care in estimating maintenance and operating expense, the Chief Architect and his staff should discuss this problem with builders during preapplication conferences.

The use of maintenance saving materials, efficient equipment, and efficient design, may cost more than alternate materials, equipment and design, but in many cases the increase in mortgage amount necessary to finance the extra cost will involve additional debt service which is only a fraction of the saving in maintenance cost and operating expense. Builders should be encouraged to take advantage of this to reduce total monthly housing expense in our low cost programs. In the higher priced homes, they should be encouraged to use the same principle to make it possible for a purchaser to carry a larger mortgage without increasing monthly housing expense thus making available funds for other betterments."

This is an exciting new concept in mortgage lending, AGA points out, and one which makes sense for the homeowner.

Tempered Tough

Hardboard panels are designated as "standard" or "tempered." Because of the many varieties of applications, special processes have been developed to produce hardboard with special properties. By the addition of chemicals in standard hardboard and a heat-treating process, the product takes on added stiffness and hardness, better finishing properties, greater resistance to abrasion, and particularly to moisture. This is tempered hardboard.
